Right to Erasure (Right to be Forgotten)

The right to Erasure, known as the right to be forgotten, is where you can ask us to consider deleting information that we hold about you or your child.

We will already have explained to you through our Privacy Notice how long we intend to hold your personal data before we delete it, however you still have the right to challenge us to delete your data at any time.

You can expect your request for deleting your personal data to be successful if:

- It is no longer 'necessary' for us to keep the data for the purpose stated on the Privacy Notice.
- We are holding and using the data based only on your consent, and you have decided to withdraw this consent.
- We are holding and using the data for our 'legitimate interests'. You may decide to object to this, and we can't give a reason for keeping it that outweighs your decision.
- We are holding and using the data to allow us to market goods and services to you and you ask us to stop.
- We have been holding and using your data unlawfully.
- Deleting is required by law.
- We're using data about your child to support a chargeable online service.

The law has a number of reasons why we are allowed to refuse erasure requests, those that are most likely to apply are where we're holding or using your data:

- To comply with a legal requirement.
- Where we are doing something in the public interest or acting within our role as an education charity.
- To keep a historical record of MathsMakers activity for future generations.
- Where we need it because it supports a legal case.

When we agree to delete information about you, we will have procedures in place to inform other organisations with whom we have shared your data, for example if we have contractors working on our behalf. Our decision to delete your data means that they should delete it also.

When we agree to delete information following your request, or routinely as part of our records management procedures, we will make sure that the data in whatever format is destroyed securely and cannot be reused, or it will be permanently changed so that it can no longer identify you or your child.
